

independent of their origin could develop stable epiphytic populations. Surprisingly, in the embryonated egg model there was no difference of virulence between clinical and vegetable P. agglomerans isolates. However, these strains were significantly less virulent than a phytopathogenic P. ananatis isolate.

We could find no experimental evidence that different P. agglomerans isolates show adaptations to different niches and specifically to warm blooded hosts. Thus, it might be necessary to reconsider the biosafety level of P. agglomerans.
